“Too many young people are getting their sex education online from viewing p0rnographic films... young children need to be made aware of the risks of what they are doing. Schools have a role to play in this. Teachers and parents have a critical role to play...”

— Chief Constable Simon Bailey, National Police lead for child protection

PURPOSE

This course will offer insight into the influence that p*rn is having on our young people's brains, bodies and relationships. We will identify why teaching about the harmful effects of p*rnography is essential and how early education can help prevent the embedding of damaging behaviours and attitudes which jeopardise the fabric of our society.

During the day we will discuss

- How the digital landscape has dramatically changed accessibility to harmful content.
- The main influences in our young people's minds that shape their attitudes
- The science of addiction and brain chemistry with regard to online p*rn consumption • The qualities that feature in healthy relationships - not just the VERY base line of consent, but love, respect, trust and intimacy - all of which are absent on most easily accessible p*rn sites.
- Language we can use with pupils, staff and parents
- How to engage parents and carers in these tricky topics.

Audience Heads, Deputy Heads, Heads of PSHEE, PSHEE Coordinators, Teachers of PSHEE, Pastoral leads, Wellbeing leads

Objective This course will provide educators the confidence, knowledge and reason needed to embrace the teaching of relationships and sex in the face of the influence of p*rnography.
